Topic: Unusual Presentations of Bullous Pemphigoid- Lessons from cases
Moderator: - Dr. Samarjit Roy (Professor)

Abstract:

Bullous Pemphigoid is an autoimmune subepidermal blistering disorder, predominantly affecting the elderly. It is mediated by autoantibodies against BP180 and BP230 antigens, leading to separation at the dermo-epidermal junction. While classically characterized by tense bullae and pruritus, the disease demonstrates a broad and evolving clinical spectrum, with atypical variants posing significant diagnostic challenges. The objective is to highlight the diverse and atypical presentations of bullous pemphigoid as well as the importance of histopathological and immunological investigations in diagnosing the disease. Atypical presentations of bullous pemphigoid need early recognition supported by appropriate immunological investigations for optimal outcomes. Individualized treatment strategies, along with emerging targeted therapies, hold promise in improving disease prognosis.

A case series of three patients with clinically varied manifestations of bullous pemphigoid will be presented by the Department of Dermatology, Venereology and Leprosy.
