Topic: Incidental detection of a rare diagnosis with multidisciplinary approach - Impacted enterolith with meckel's diverticulitis in a 56yr old male

Presenter: - Dr. Prashant JR, Radiodiagnosis, Dr. Himanshi Gera JR, Surgery, Dr. Beena Thuwal, JR, Pathology

Moderator: - Dr. Gaurav Benjwal, Assistant Professor, Radiology

Abstract: Meckel's diverticulum is the most common congenital anomaly of the gastrointestinal tract, yet Meckel's diverticulitis remains a rare and often elusive diagnosis in adults due to its nonspecific clinical presentation. We present a rare case of an adult patient who presented with vague, non-localizing abdominal pain and minimal clinical signs, posing a diagnostic challenge. Initial laboratory investigations were inconclusive. Cross-sectional imaging to rule out renal and ureteric pathology incidentally revealed impacted enterolith with features suggestive of inflamed Meckel's diverticulum, altering the diagnostic trajectory and prompting early surgical consultation. The patient subsequently underwent operative management, where the radiological findings were confirmed intraoperatively, and definitive surgical treatment was successfully performed.

This case highlights the critical role of radiology in identifying uncommon causes of acute abdomen, particularly when clinical findings are subtle or atypical. It also underscores the importance of multidisciplinary collaboration between radiologists and surgeons in achieving timely diagnosis and optimal patient outcomes. Awareness of Meckel's diverticulitis as a differential diagnosis in adults with vague abdominal pain can prevent diagnostic delays, reduce morbidity, and guide appropriate surgical intervention.
